

Sandra repeatedly got picked on by the teacher, Ms. Brown, who had it out for her. Ms. Brown always gave her bad grades on homework. Sandra had enough and started telling Ms. Smith to her face that she was a terrible teacher. The other kids oohed and aahed, and Ms. Smith gave Sandra detention. Sandra sat alone in detention, and was angry. Why should she even have to do homework? Her parents got paid for work, so why didn't she get paid? This was unfair. Sandra then remembered that some of the other kids complained about homework, and realized she was not alone. Sandra secretly organized a boycott and protest when they let her go for lunch. The next day, none of the kids turned in their homework and they chanted "No pay, no homework!" at the homeroom teacher when she came in, in the morning. In this way, Sandra used her anger to fight for the rights of both herself and her classmates.
